A GENUINE HERO.

The saving of six lives, at Empire, by young Johnny Crow, is one of the most genuine cases of heroism that has been recorded for many a day.

Think of it, a boy 13 years of age plunged into the icy waters and rescued five children, one after the other.

One of the children was taken by the current under the ice, but the brave lad never hesitated a moment to dive and swim over twenty feet under the ice to reach, and come up with the child in his arms.

It was a great display of heroism to snatch five lives from the dreadful clutch of the flood, but not one man in a thousand, after these exertions would have taken the terrible risk of a plunge under the ice, taking a chance against death where the odds were a hundred to one against ever coming out alive.

But the boy appears to have considered nothing except the one fact that human life was at stake and he had decided to save it.

Thousands of men have been decorated for bravery in battle who never displayed one tenth of the calm, cool courage which goes to the splendid record of this thirteen year old boy. All hail to him, and we imagine that it will be many a long year before any town in the Union can show a boy or man who can match his splendid achievement of last Sunday.

Why Not One as Well as the Other

If the Government can carry a letter across the continent for two cents, why cannot it send a telegraphic message correspondingly cheap? If the Government can build and manage a navy, why cannot it build and operate a railroad? If the Government can run the Treasury Department, why cannot it run the banks? If the Government can maintain an army of soldiers in idleness, why cannot it support an army of laborers at some useful occupation? If the Government can serve the people at less cost than private corporations why does not it do so. —Boston Investigator.
